

Ensembling

Declaration : The central idea and coding is abstract from Kevin mark ham youtube video series, Introduction to machine learning with scikit-learn video series. You can find link under resources section.

This study find hard to obtain better accuracy with overall data. With a complete dataset for end station the model predicts 0.067 percent of accuracy, to avoid this, I focus on a limited number of end station. From our previous model query, we were supposed that 'it does not matter where the bicycle trip will start. We were more interested in where this trip ends and to achieve this end. We have pick five main busiest end stations from earlier EDA process. Afterwards, all that effort we finished with KNN Neighbours with $k = 1$ which give us mean accuracy of 72 percent. We were not really happy with the result. To solve this matter, we have determined to apply some other model and technique. To achieved better accuracy I have decided to use Ensemble learning (or "ensembling").

Ensemble learning (or "ensembling") is simply the procedure of combining several models to solve a prediction problem, with the goal of creating a blended model that is more precise than any single model. For classification problems, the combination is often done by majority vote. For regression problems, the combination is frequently caused by submitting an average of the previsions.

For ensembling to play well, the individual models must satisfy two conditions:

- Models should be accurate (they must outperform random guessing)
- Models should be independent (their predictions are not correlated with one another)

The idea, then, is that if you have a collection of individually imperfect (and independent) models, the "one-off" mistakes made by each model are probably not going to be made by the rest of the models, and thus the mistakes will be discarded when averaging the models.

It turns out that as I add more models to the voting process, the probability of error decreases. This is known as Condorcet's Jury Theorem, which was developed by a French political scientist in the 18th century.

Bootstrapping

Some introductory terminology: According to statistics "bootstrapping" refers to the process of using "bootstrap samples" to quantify the uncertainty of a model. Bootstrap samples are just random samples with replacement:

Bagging

On their own, decision trees are non competitive with the best supervised learning methods in terms of predictive accuracy. However, they can be used as the basis for more modern methods that cause much higher accuracy!

One of the main issues with decision trees is high variance, meaning that different splits in the training data can contribute to very different trees. "Bootstrap aggregation" (aka "bagging") is a training data can contribute to very different trees. Bootstrap aggregation (and bagging) is a general design procedure for thinning out the variance of a machine learning method, but is particularly useful for decision trees.

Bagging process:

- Take repeated bootstrap samples (random samples with replacement) from the training data set
- Train our method on each bootstrapped training set and create predictions
- Average the predictions

This increases predictive accuracy by reducing the variance, similar to how cross-validation reduces the variation associated with the test set approach (for calculating out-of-sample error) by splitting many times and averaging the effects.

Applying bagging to decision trees

- Grow B regression trees using B bootstrapped training sets
- Grow each tree deep, so that each one has low bias
- Every tree makes a numeric prediction, and the predictions are averaged (to cut down the discrepancy)

It is used in a standardized fashion to classification trees, except that during the production stage, the overall prediction is grounded upon a majority vote of the trees.

Avoiding Overfitting We are practicing a large enough value that the error appears to have stabilised. (Selecting a value of B that is "excessively great" will generally not lead to overfitting.)

What are the features?

- trip_id: A unique number to identify each trip
- From station Number: From station number where the trip Start
- Day: Day of the trip for example Monday, Tuesday etc.
- Month: Which month trip took place
- Duration: Total trip duration in minutes
- birthyear: Birth year of user
- Sex: Gender identification of user
- age: Current age of user

What is the response?

- Station Number: To Station Number where the trip ends

Question: Can we predict the End station of a bicycle trip by given bicycle dataset?

Estimating out-of-sample error

Bagged models have a very nice property: out-of-sample error can be calculated without using the test set approach or cross-validation!

Here's how the out-of-sample estimation process works with bagged trees:

- On average, each bagged tree uses about two-thirds of the observations. For each tree, the remaining observations are called "out-of-bag" observations.
- For the first observation in the training data, predict its response using only the trees in which that observation was out-of-bag. Average those predictions (for regression) or take a majority vote (for classification).
- Repeat this procedure for every observation in the training data.
- Compare all predictions to the actual answers in order to compute a mean squared error or classification error. This is recognized as the out-of-bag error.

When B is sufficiently large, the out-of-bag error is an accurate estimate of out-of-sample error.

Use the "set difference" to identify the out-of-bag observations for each tree

In [13]:

print (sorted(set(range(14)) - set(sample1)))
[2, 5, 8, 9, 10, 13]

In [14]:

print (sorted(set(range(14)) - set(sample2)))
[0, 3, 7, 9, 11]

In [15]:

print (sorted(set(range(14)) - set(sample3)))
[0, 1, 2, 5, 9, 12, 13]

So, we would predict the response for observation 4 by using tree 1 (because it is only out-of-bag for tree 1). We would predict the response for observation 5 by averaging the predictions from trees 1, 2, and 3 (since it is out-of-bag for all three trees). We would reiterate this procedure for all notices, and then work out the MSE using those predictions.

Estimating variable importance

Although bagging increases predictive accuracy, it decreases model interpretability because it's no longer possible to envision the tree to see the importance of each variable.

Nevertheless, we can still receive an overall summary of "variable importance" from bagged models:

- To compute variable importance for bagged regression trees, we can calculate the total amount that the mean squared error is decreased due to tears over a given predictor, averaged over all trees.

- A standardized procedure is used for bagged classification trees, except we use the Gini index instead of the average squared error.

Random Forests

Random Forests are a slight variation of bagged trees that has even more dependable performance! Here's how it works:

- Exactly like bagging, we produce an ensemble of decision trees using bootstrapped samples of the training set.
- However, when building each tree, each time a split is considered, a random sample of m predictors is chosen as split candidates from the full set of p predictors. The split is merely permitted to use one of those m predictors.
- A new random sample of predictors is chosen for every single tree at every single split.
- For classification, m is typically chosen to be the square root of p . For regression, m is typically chosen to be somewhere between $p/3$ and p .

Main Idea:

- Suppose there is one very strong predictor in the data set. When using bagged, trees, most of the trees will use that predictor as the top split, resulting in an ensemble of similar trees that are "highly correlated".
- Averaging highly correlated quantities does not significantly reduce variance (which is the total goal of bagging).
- By randomly leaving out candidate predictors from each split, Random Forests "decorrelates" the trees, such that the averaging process can reduce the variation of the resulting model.

Mean squared error or classification error also known classification accuracy: 81.8065764023 Percent

Conclusion:

We are really happy with the result the Mean squared error or classification error also known classification accuracy: 81.8065764023 Percent which is nearly 82 percent. So, we can conclude our study with confirming that we could predict end station by using given cycle data with an accuracy of 82 %.
